

---

In a Galaxy Far, Far AwRy
The Story So Far: Franchise

Liam Gibbs

---

THE STORY SO FAR...

---

Issue 1: Serial Fiction Sideshow, available in the hearts of one and all.

Issue 2: Home Sweet Home Invasion, available in the hearts of one and all.

Issue 3: Technophobia, available in the h—you're starting to see a pattern here, aren't you?

Issue 4: Armageddon Trigger Finger, available in...hey... your heart. And one and all's too.

Issue 5: The Genetic Equation, available blah blah blah.

Issue 6: Power Tool, not available. Just kidding. Totally available.

Issue 7: The Lesser of Two Egos, coming sometime.

Issue 0: The Story So Far, you know the drill.

Please visit www.inagalaxyfarfarawRy.com for more info.

OTHER BLASPHEMIES OF ART

---

Not So Superpowered, available at tiny.cc/nssuperpowered

Three Flash Fictions, available upon request from the author

High school love notes to no one in particular

---

FRANCHISE IN "THAT ONE WHERE STUFF HAPPENS"

---

July 20, 9108. 4:18 p.m. (Galactic Standard Time).

The Refensil Recharge Station wasn't a happening place on a Saturday afternoon. No customers. No transports to charge. Not even a stray dog sniffed around the lot. The chemical plant two blocks away had better garbage to root through anyway. And the garbage mutated only the sick and infirm. Even the trees refused to sway in the wind. The station slept as silently as an empty funeral parlor and felt as lifeless and still as a corpse on a gurney. The single-lane street outside was as lonely as a playground at night, dry wind whistling eerily through the recharge bay. The inactivity was so palpable, it weighed on your lungs like inhaled water.

Jacob's chin rested on his fist on the counter of the cash booth in the rear of the recharge station's kiosk. Stuck working. His lips lazily rubbed together in the longest boredom moue he'd made since his mom had dragged him to that charity book burning.

On a contentedly brilliant day like today, Jacob noted how few customers needed a recharge. The recharge coils, fat and pliable conduits with pronged ends that locked into a transport's charging socket, hung lifelessly in cradles. The only living thing that had popped in to the station's kiosk was a pigeon with one tattered wing. The pigeon had mustered the gall to flap in through the latent-technology door. The l-door dispersed into computer memory, as all l-tech did when so commanded, to allow the bird to pass. The bird snatched a bag of potato chips off a rack and dashed back out the l-door. Dash meant it had swooped around in a lopsided circle, clonked its head against the fridge doojigger containing the milk, grabbed the snack, and then twirled its way drunkenly out the l-door. And know what? Jacob let it. Watching that bird escape offered the most entertainment he'd had all day without access to a rock and that abandoned window factory. Besides, the pigeon had made off with a bag of onions-and-chives-flavored chips. Blech. Thank you, come again.

The l-door reappeared, blocking the brittle heat from entering the kiosk.

When he couldn't find any mice to pit against each other in the death-match ring—first prize was cheese, second prize was a shoebox grave—Jacob spent his shifts finger-combing his short, brown crewcut for lack of anything better to do. Today, that didn't even entertain him. And, crock, he just realized he was an organizer of animal blood sports.

Nope. All the happenings and occurrences were happening and occurring elsewhere. Happencurring. Hapcurring. Hapcurring-hapcurring-hapcurrin—Okay, now he knew it was possible to die from boredom. And that words really did sound weird when you repeated them over and over. And over and over and overoverover—

Jacob huffed out through those pressed lips that had dried together from underuse. He drummed his fingers on the booth counter, which woke the cash computer embedded in the glass-top surface. Now he was charging up a nonexistent civilian transport at coil four. A conduit hissed to life, thrashing out of its cradle like a snake pouncing on prey. It snapped at an alley cat pawing at discarded food by the street. Okay, correction: this offered the most entertainment he'd had all day. Holy hapcurring, life was sad.

Jacob heaved out a melancholic sigh, a full-body affair. Across the desolate street filled with filth and life's depression, a Fireball-type military transport whispered to the pavement at the rival station, the Better Than the Refensil Recharge Station, trademark in a tug-of-war due to a languishing legal battle. Two Terrans exited the mil-tran. Riding on his hyperability of self-propelled flight, one rocketed around haphazardly like an untied balloon farting out the last of its payload, his hair as yellow as the sweltering summer sun above. A hyperperson, like Jacob. The other Terran, redheaded, tried to coax Yellow down with shouted promises of fried bacon wrapped in maple bacon. Yellow whacked into the Better Than the Refensil Recharge Station sign, shattering "Better Than" in a wispy contrail of neon sparks and glass. Oh, good. Nothing like a little customer confusion.

Jacob lifted his cheek out of his hand. Cracking his knuckles, he sat on the sticky floor behind the cash desk. He couldn't see the area of the kiosk holding the snacks and transport supplies except from the security viewscreen affixed to the ceiling, but so what? That lopsided pigeon could flap in and steal the kiosk's whole arsenal of cookies for all Jacob cared. Except the Chips Ahoy!, bird. Leave the Chips Ahoy! alone.

A computerized bell dinged to mark someone's entry. Huh? Impossible. "Customer entering," said the booth's haunt control, called such because it was a voice-interface computer program that governed things automatically, making them seem—see where this was going?—haunted. Jacob's parents owned the station and had programmed the haunt control with Jacob's dad's gruff voice since that was enough to "remind" Jacob to "get back to work" whenever a "customer" "wanted a recharge." Wishful thinking, dad. (Jacob's dad liked finger quotes.) (Which he used frequently with liberal sarcasm.) (Especially when referring to his in-laws.)

Jacob stood—whoa-ob—and reeled from a lightheaded buzz brought on from apathetic inactivity and then sudden movement.

(And his in-laws' table manners. Ahem. "Table manners.")

"How can I...help you?" Jacob's sentence choked out when he saw the green-skinned, hairless Trioxidillian, who panicked into the rack of thruster lubricants as the l-door through which he'd entered dinged back into solidity. Huh. Trioxidillians rarely came to the city of Thunder Pass. And they never spilled several quarts of lube all over the stained linoleum tiles in a phobic duck for cover.

Jacob finished cracking his knuckles, savoring the last one since there was nothing else to do after. Boredom would set in again now like quicksand.

The Trioxidillian, calmer now that the l-door had reappeared, flattened the ruffles in his Intergalactic Protection military uniform, straightened his cross necklace, and approached the cash booth. "I'm looking for a Jacob Refensil." With more than his share of worry spots speckling his forehead like green leopard print, he looked around to see if anyone else occupied the kiosk. Fat chance today.

The two Terrans who'd banged up the sign across the street were now on the Refensil lot, Yellow challenging the runaway recharge coil to a fistfight as it bucked back from him like a cobra waiting for an opportunity to snap.

"Don't worry. They're with me," the Trioxidillian said.

"That's unfortunate." All the energy Jacob rallied up to show his condolences resulted in a half smirk.

"You should see what the blond one did to my mil-tran's navigation computer. Right now the mil-tran thinks we're visiting a sweat lodge. I didn't know hot sauce had that effect on guidance systems. Anyway, do you know where Mr. Refensil might be?"

Jacob pretended the lottery stubs in the overhead display needed urgent organizing. He rifled through them. "You're looking at him."

Yellow now engaged in a bitter battle with that coil, which had twined around him like a boa constrictor preparing to feed. Red tore at it to loosen it.

The Trioxidillian offered a slow nod, opening his mouth but saying nothing as if to speak stealthily. He slipped another glance around the kiosk, so silently his eyes seemed to creak like a rusty gate. He reaffirmed no one else was here except that pigeon who'd retuned for ranch dressing to complement its chips. Satisfied, the Trioxidillian leaned forward—and accidentally whacked his skull into the protective shield screen that separated attendant from customer. He rubbed his bruised forehead. "You have the hyperability of self-duplication."

Jacob stopped rifling. A lottery stub fell on his head. A cold zap whisked through him like a shockwave, an anxiety he hadn't felt since his old crush, Mindy Purlex, unexpectedly popped by the station after Jacob had finished servicing/losing to a civ-tran's oil leak. His first inclination was to lie to the military man—uh, hum, errr, ugh—but his brain only offered a stammer. "Yyyyyeah. I might have—I mean, I guess—" He swallowed and assembled a thought. "I have the hyperability of self-delusion."

Yeah. Nice one, brain. You've put in a full day's work. You can take the rest of the afternoon off now.

Yellow walloped into the window behind the kiosk's advertisement for Gecko Juice, a product name and ingredient list, according to the packaging. Jacob jolted back—yikes!—but relaxed when he realized Yellow had only cracked the window.

Red rushed over to tame the recharge coil off Yellow, which quivered like a threatened rattlesnake.

Jacob slowed his derailed breathing and turned back to the Trioxidillian. “Look, I haven’t done anything wrong since the last time one of my duplicates defecated in traffic. It’s been thirty-two days without a clone accident.” He pointed to a sign hanging by the l-door as proof. “That sign says I officially made it past a month. So if you’re here to arrest me for something, I can honestly say it was my evil twin, triplet, quadruplet, quintuplet.” He shrugged. “Or my cousin. He looks a lot like me and suffers from kleptomania.” He eyed Yellow to see what that maniac was ruining now.

“No, I’m looking for you. I’m Lieutenant Colonel Matross Legion of Intergalactic Protection”—he flashed an embossed badge so fast it could have been a backstage pass to a concert for all Jacob knew—“and I’m assembling a task force comprised of individuals with hyperabilities. I’m looking for someone with your... gift.” That last portentous word sounded as if this Legion had stamped it CONFIDENTIAL LEVEL B.

Jacob was intrigued, which he realized was a warm feeling that functioned as antidote to cold shock. “By ‘gift,’ you’re not talking about my unparalleled tendency to ruin brussels sprouts. Are you?”

Ding. The l-door vaporized to dust. Yellow ducked his head in. “No brusselly sprouty thingies! They makes me fart!”

Red wrenched him back out by the collar. “They don’t make you fart, and you could use more iron in your diet.” The l-door reappeared. The coil attacked again, striking like a death adder that had finally gotten its chance.

Jacob's eyes tracked Yellow as the coil snatched him away into the bank of four charging coils. "Holy personal property damage, whatever you're talking about, keep me far, far, far away from that crocker." He pointed a finger at Yellow.

His eyes found this Lieutenant Colonel Legion again. "But I'm listening," he said with a raised eyebrow and intonation. He started cracking his knuckles again and noticed, in the lieutenant colonel's curled lip, a hint of aversion at the habit. "Intergalactic Protection and hyperpeople, though? I thought hyperpeople were banned from military service."

"They are. But this matter is urgent, and we don't have time to uproot the Hyperability Injunction. So Intergalactic Protection has given me the go-ahead to form a new task force in order to duck that little matter." Lieutenant Colonel Legion placed his hands on the cash counter to lean in even closer, careful now to avoid that adversarial shield screen. "I can't go into details, but I'm assembling eight or nine hyperpeople to counter a united criminal front that, if unopposed, will cripple our galaxy. And for some reason destroy our best laundromats, according to the guy in charge. I really don't know what he has against laundromats." He sighed. "We need to start immediately, and if you come, you would relocate to IP's main campus on the planet Minerva. I understand that imposes a huge disruption to your life, but we have only two days—"

"Hey, mom?" Already talking on his gabber, the pea-sized communicator in his ear, Jacob raised a finger to put Lieutenant Colonel Legion on pause. The gabber had sprouted a mouthpiece and earpiece, and Jacob pressed the mouthpiece closer. “Yeah, I quit. Do you really need an answer why? Holy humdrum, mom, I’m so bored here that boredom sweat is leaking out of my boredom pores, for boredom’s sake. All of today, our only customer was a homeless guy, and he only stopped by to pee in our ice bin. No, mom, there’s no dental package in the universe you can offer to convince me to stay. See you at Thanksgiving. Oh, and one of our windows is cracked, but we got some hilarious security footage out of the deal. I gotta go.” He tapped a finger on his gabber to terminate the call, and the mouthpiece and earpiece retracted.

He hit a button on his desk to switch the shield screen to unidirectional, allowing things to pass out the cash area but not in. “Let’s do this.” He reached out to Lieutenant Colonel Legion across the shield screen. The screen crackled as he pierced it, and static caressed his arm hairs like an electric lover. He grabbed Lieutenant Colonel Legion’s calloused hand in his and forced a firm handshake. The lieutenant colonel looked dumbfounded.

Lieutenant Colonel Legion disengaged from his incredulity and reconnected with reality. “G-good. Okay. Good. And, yeah”—his eyes scanned the kiosk in a full circle—“we probably offer better dental than this place. We have tooth replacement.”

“You say that without knowing what happened the last time one of those recharge coils jumped me by surprise.” Jacob skittered away from the coil slapping the cracked window. “They’re very cunning.”

Want more? Course you do. These stories are like popcorn: what good is one handful?

Good thing there is more. Check out the story this directly ties into at <http://bit.ly/iagffa1> and then weep.
Weep for joy.

Keep tabs at tiny.cc/iagffa www
Like on tiny.cc/iagffa facebook
Follow at tiny.cc/iagffa twitter
Link at tiny.cc/iagffa linkedin